Four years! and yet it seems but one short day
Since first we gathered in the chapel hall.
Yet in that time how much has passed!
Not joy alone but deepest pain
Makes up the perfect life.
And we possess the tender memories
Of happy days and some so strangely sad,
Yet all a part of that mysterious past,
The dear, too swiftly-passing, College days.

* * * * * * * *

May those who turn the pages of this little book
And find therein our pictured selves
With simple tokens of the life we led,
Live over with us the fond memories,
The dear, too swiftly-passing, College days.

THE SPIRIT'S RETURN

It was Christmas Eve, nineteen hundred and fifty-seven, and the silent halls echoed and re-echoed with the slightest sound. The tall clock struck twelve, slowly, sadly, mournfully, and as the twelfth stroke died away in the distance, the spirits of the ancients appeared. Many there were and of all shapes and conditions, but one, among them, robed in purest white, trailed in the dust, a faded garnet streamer, which bore in time-worn white letters the mystic device, '07. Gliding noiselessly down the corridor, the spirit advanced slowly to the stair case, ascended the stairs, pausing on each for an instant, until the well known third floor was reached.

"Ah," sighed the spirit, "once, long ago, I stood with bated breath while my precious charge, ran, flew, nay, even leaped, up these same stairs. 'Twas on that quiet eve, when, filled with an eager zeal for progress, one by one, they formed in line, the baby at the head, and under her skillful guidance were marshalled down this narrow way, but ah, me—the door opened, a vision appeared and the merry throng disbanded, striving in mad haste to disappear into the air above them. The rest, I will not recall," and the spirit wiped away a tear and passed on.

He paused in the hall and listened. "No, it's but a dream," he murmured, "no stealthy step approaches, no grasping hand shall ever again take from one of my fair virgins, that little candle which shed its beams so far, only to be dashed into utter darkness."

But these halls were not ever the scenes of desolation and despair, "the melancholy voice went on." Well I remember how Judie and the baby played and romped and made the echoes with their childish glee. Their artless prattle and their innocent happiness have many a time made glad the hearts of their comrades, on whom the hand of Fate had descended and demanded the inexorable 'ten cents.'"

The stately figure halted before a door on which could still be deciphered "16." He turned the knob and entered. "Here on this spot half a century ago, there was presented a picture which I shall never forget. Crouched on the floor by the dim, flickering light of one small candle, eleven maidens sat and ate, oh, by the shades of Psychology, how they ate! And when the sacred rites were fulfilled, and the shadows danced on the wall the Ph D. and Maud, inspired by the pie, rose and showed to their hushed listeners, their histrionic talent. The candle has long since burned away but those thrilling tones resound in my ears still."

Down the silent hall the spirit sped and entered the portals of another room. 'Twas here he chuckled with hollow, ghostly laughter, that Maud, in frantic haste, arrayed herself in all her finery as for a Freshman reception. 'Twas here that she proudly decked in that one and only desp'rate waist, waited until the joke "dawned upon" her and she fled from the jeers of her companions. She was a weird creature—in one of her travels. Vainly she searched for that classic book "The Lay of the Last Hen" which, alas she never found.

Gliding down, down, far into the darkness of the vault beneath the stately mansion, the spirit put aside with an ethereal hand, the gossamer webs before his face and peered into the gloom. "Once, these dry old walls were the bulwarks of a mighty flood that foamed and eddied and threatened with destruction the simple furnishing of these apartments. And in these floods, Lize, frantically battled, until at last the ruin she had caused, was partially cleared away and the worst was over. Some one had said that Lize was both graceful and dignified, but who would have dreamed that she would have essayed to waft the dainty wash boiler, full to the brim, airily about, until, oh, tragedy, it fell from her finger tips and brought disaster."

But the time for departure was approaching and up to the old, familiar kitchen, the spirit rose. Methinks I see again those delicious, tempting cakes, yes even the faculty cakes. They were, and I think of their disappearance shrouded in deepest mystery. "Who could have," but out on the stillness, the clock in the distant hall struck one and the spirit of '07 sighed and was gone.

DELTA DELTA

Our first acquaintance with Parker Hall was not such as would be expected to give us great love for the place, for we were greeted with shouts from the upper windows which sounded to our unaccustomed ears very much like "Water! Water!" These words at first conveyed little meaning, but after a long experience with those paper bags which dropped so suddenly from upper windows and struck our shoulders with a splash, we needed no explanation of the cry "Water!" In those days Parker Hall must be approached carefully and doors entered quickly, for we were often reminded that we were Freshmen. Even after getting inside we were not always safe, as some of us found one day while running up the stairs after giving our class yell.

There were little evening calls made by the Sophomores for the purpose of getting acquainted with our ability in singing and public speaking. If our voices were not very steady on some of these occasions it may be attributed to our being unaccustomed to a table as a stage. One of our boys was a few weeks late in entering college, and after hearing from his room mate of those evening calls, retired early with an uneasy mind. He did not have to wait long to find that his fears were not ungrounded. But what was his surprise to learn, after finishing the evening's entertainment, that his audience was composed of his own classmates who were following the Sophomores' examples to get acquainted. The tables were soon turned however, for these same classmates were all visited an hour or two later by the Sophomores.

How hard it sometimes was to study. For there were those who must show their ability in military drills or by practicing what they would do if Parker Hall should get on fire. Then somehow there were many old pieces of broken furniture which had a way of rolling down stairs just when we wished particularly to apply ourselves to our books, and when the college band was organized—well, then we gave up study and sleep altogether.

I wonder if there is any one of us who does not have recollections of being suddenly awakened by Percy's talking in his sleep? If there is such a one he must have slept in the most remote corner of the building, and his ability to sleep sound is to be envied. Let us hope that Percy is not accountable for what he said, for his expressions differed from those used in prayer-meeting.

One night the foundations of Parker Hall were suddenly shaken. We awoke with a start, prepared for some great calamity. But what did we find? Only that Grif had fallen from his second story bunk to the floor. The injury to Parker Hall was slight, but we read in the papers the next day of a terrible earthquake in Jamaica. The question is, which was cause and which was effect.

One of our most exciting experiences was when our class detective tried to discover who stole the fuses to his lights. Suddenly his lights would go out, and then he would swiftly pursue the sound of flying footsteps up stairs and down and through the halls, but to no avail. One evening a large trunk was carefully placed in front of our detective's door and then the main switch was suddenly turned off, leaving the whole building in darkness. Our detective, thinking that some one was taking his fuse, rushed out with a speed that would have won the intercollegiate 100-yards dash, but he didn't hurdle the trunk successfully, and as the lights came on again he was picking himself up from behind the trunk.

It is generally understood that girls are afraid of mice, but that the boys of Parker Hall should be troubled by these harmless little creatures seems almost incredible. Nevertheless Guy Bill doesn't like to have them creep around over his toes after he goes to bed, and even an imaginary mouse is better than an alarm clock to get him out in the morning. Harlow also had his troubles when he found a mouse one night, tied in his bed.

How glad our classmate from Gray was when he was informed by telephone that he had made the prize division in the Sophomore dees. He came right back by the first train, but the rehearsal he arranged with Prof. Robie, didn't prove a success.

Room 8, the headquarters of the Reform Club has been a much frequented resort. Always right after supper we could find a jolly crowd there. Studies troubled us but little; yet no doubt we gained much knowledge from the philosophical discussions of King Methuselah. Another favorite resort was room 22. Many important questions were discussed there, but we had to be careful or Jack would turn the conversation to college girls. How long we will remember those friendly gatherings, and especially those feeds that we had when someone had a birthday, or for some reason got a box from home. That was a jolly time which we had after the Sophomore debates were over. Then it was that the "champs" celebrated. Speaking of feeds makes me think of those dinners that we had sometimes at the Lake Grove House.

When we came home on the cars, we were so quiet and talked of such grave subjects that the passengers sometimes remarked, "What a nice thing it is to have an education."

When those warm spring days came there were many gatherings on the steps and around the tennis courts. Then came those Sunday afternoons when we went up on Mt. David, and took walks across the fields. Surely as we look back on these four short years, we can have but pleasant memories of the days we boys have spent together.

Viewed from our standpoint, Milliken House is a delightful place. As it is customary to begin with foundations, there is in the basement a large stove, which is of use when the demand for fudge, pop-corn balls, or molasses candy is greater than can be supplied by chafing-dishes. For such it has often been used, and on one occasion it was stated by a participant in the sport that the molasses candy was made in the coal-hod, and stirred with the clothes stick.

As Freshmen we enjoyed the usual fun, with, I think, a little unsolicited aid on the part of the experienced. O, that memorable first Hallowe'en! Memorable? Yes surely, the pictures of our rooms, as they were when we returned from the party, are emblazoned on our minds, never to be erased. No words can describe our feelings as we entered those rooms, once orderly and good to look upon; and the mysticism of the evening was but enhanced by the appearance of three ghosts, who, be it said, did not produce the desired effect, being immediately recognized as three very human beings. Then there was the mock Senior spread up in the "Sky Parlor," the invitations to which were answered in person; and lo! both young men (?) and maidens were present. The relics of that spread may be found to this day in names that still cling to some of the Frisbee girls. Such occurrences were like cool shady spots, as refreshment after toiling amid sharp-cornered triangles, which bruised our tempers, and elusive circles that rolled away from our grasp.

I wonder how we ever did manage to "swap clothes," but we certainly did in some way, for true it is that the coats and hats of the smaller girls were made to fit the larger, and vice versa; and we actually went to meeting thus; but we were Freshmen then. As time went on and we became more dignified, the "jolly gobbers" was formed. I cannot enumerate the meetings of this club, for its records are preserved only in the memories or its members. Beside this, one of our chief delights was to descend into the barn at Frisbee, and there with our musician perched on the stairs, brandishing our Indian clubs, we kept time to the fiddler's merry tune.

Another one of our larks took place in and about the reception room. Within this room sat two persons. Outside the door a plot was being outlined, which was finally carried out: three tall ghosts glide softly to the door of the room, mysteriously the door opens, and the said ghosts move silently and with weird effect around the dimly lighted room, the light suddenly disappears, and, at the same time, the ghostly figures vanish. The scene closes with muffled laughter from various directions, and the Proctor! ! !

Of course we studied a great deal. We really did; but after lights were out, and everything buiet, a certain mischievous young derson would slip into the room where two merry maidens dwelt, directly over the Proctor, and soon gales of laughter were issuing forth. Almost immediately, for our Proctor was very conscientious, a gentle rap sounded on the door, and a soft voice began, "girls"—but not until the aforesaid person had darted to her own room and all was quiet within. Of course, no one answered, and heavy breathing was all the mystified lady heard.

And what wonder if the good lady in charge came almost to feel that the house was haunted, as strange sounds were often heard, which she could not locate, for when she went in quest of their source, quiet, well-behaved young ladies met her wondering gaze.

All this is past—yet amid the laughter and joy of future years, in our hearts let us sing as of yore our familiar toast:

"Happy days to all those that we love,
Happy days to all those that love us,
Happy days to all those
That love them
That love us."

ALICE W. CHURCHILL.

THAT FAMOUS BIRD-WALK

The sun was shining brightly as they started on their way,
And the birds were singing sweetly on that February day,
For the hearts of men and co-eds were kept in merry tune
As at a picnic party in the joyous month of June;
But one there was who faltered as the crowd passed on its way,
As she gazed upon a giant youth well held by manhood's sway;
That her heart admired his courage was to everyone quite plain,
For their home was Old New Hampshy,
New Hampshy next to Maine.

Many were there in the party who started on that walk,
For to nearly all the students bird walks are common talk.
So among those to be noticed were Merrill, Holmes, and Jack,
While of ardent boyish spirit in them there was no lack;
And next is seen young Aldrich in appearance quite well fed
With big-footed Percy Freese a coming on ahead.
But no closer friends were noticed though their joy was near its wane
Than the friends from Old New Hampshy, New Hampshy next to Maine.

The males were not the only ones whose voice resounded loud;
But the fairer sex was present and mingled with the crowd.
One could see with careful viewing that their number grew apace
As he scanned with patient pleasure each smiling, joyous face,
Miss Porter with her quiet mien and Miss Ware with moving jaw
Was laying down to everyone the art of Bangor law.
But the most attractive countenance full of sunshine not of rain
Was the maids from Old New Hampshy, New Hampshy next to Maine.

Thus together went the party with Prof. Lizzie as the guide,
While quiet, calm and stately, walked John Pendleton at his side.
So proceeded they in gladness, scrutinizing earth and sky,
With failure after failure one single bird to spy.
Soon the crowd became divided, two by two they dropped away
Just because there were too many close together so they say.
But that two were not too (2) close why that I could not feign,
Yes the two from Old New Hampshy, New Hampshy next to Maine.

Every cloud our teachers taught us always has a silver lining,
So each mid-day has its darkness even though the sun is shining,
Thus the mist came down about them and the two who felt its sway
Were Joseph Henry McIntyre and Miss Florence Knight Bray.
For young Merrill in his travels thought to imitate old Joe,
And to show him, well, quite simply how with co-eds he should go.
Oh! Dame Fortune to another Thou has brought thy dreadful bane,
To the friends from Old New Hampshy, Old New Hampshy next to Maine.

For a while they walked together, talking, laughing, gay and free,
Miss Florence acting cunning, and young Judge chuck full of glee.
But old Mac's eyes flashed with fire and his heart severely torn,
Gave his face a blear appearance and his whole frame seemed to mourn.
So when they had finished playing and they backward turned again,
He refused to listen to them, since his joy was mixed with pain,
And this simple childish action had scarcely left him sane,
The man from Old New Hampshy, Old New Hampshy next to Maine.

Not alone before the party did he scorn her anxious word
But from that day to the present he from her no word has heard.
Sadness mingled in his gladness, sorrow in her cup of joy,
He of her thinks hourly, daily, she dreams of her one time boy.
Now to us doth come this moral, learn it well before you leave,
Never imitate another, for some one may have to grieve.
For to two it brought its sadness, and their joy is turned to pain,
The two from Old New Hampshy, Old New Hampshy next to Maine.

IVY DAY

TWO 1907 ORGANIZATIONS

Great crises rarely occur in human history, yet we of 1907, within a few short weeks were cognizant of two. The first of these occurred on a cold, stormy night in February, when a band of noble youths met in room 8, Parker Hall, with the avowed purpose of reforming the old institutions of Bates College. After a lively discussion the Reform Club was organized, and several motions were passed. It was voted:

1. To strongly condemn any man suspected of studying.
2. To adopt as the club cigar, the "Onion 25 cent Smokeless."
3. To conduct an Anti-Water Campaign.
4. To compel every member of the club to retire before 9 (A.M.)
5. To hire money enough of the club Graft Merchant to enable King Methuselah to retire for life.
6. To hold an Annual Banquet every month at the Lake Grove House.

The following is the organization of the club:

REFORM CLUB

ANTI-REFORM CLUB

The news of the organization of a Reform Club spread among the men of 1907 until the cry arose, "What is to be done?" It was then that the bold Penobscot and Waldo county Democrats rallied their shrinking forces about the old college, and the Anti-Reform Club became a thing of life. How well we remember the stirring times that followed: those long evening smoke-talks; those excursions to Georgie Ross (especially on ladies night) when we assisted in breaking the college rules so dear to the heart of every student, and the whist tournament won by our beloved professor. Yes, we opposed every reform, even to the attendance at chapel exercises, and strange to say, a truce was finally agreed upon, and today we have peace.

BASKETBALL TEAM

BASEBALL MEN

I'm a Bates man born, I'm a Bates man bred,
And when I die there's a Bates man dead,
Oh! Rah rah Batesinrina, rah rah Batesinrina,
Rah rah Batesinrina, rah, rah, rah.

We are bold Bates men and we're always in it.
We're behind you boys every minute.
And if you work hard you will surely win it.
Everybody up and shout for B--a--t--e--s.

Here's for Bates, boys, and the garnet,
Proudest hue in State of Maine;
Cheer your men till David's Mountain
Echoes forth the glad refrain.

Here's to vict'ry for our colors,
Wave them proudly, rear them high,
For they stand for college spirit,
And the will to do or die.

Here's to thee, our Alma Mater,
Guardian of our student days,
To thy honor give we ever
All our hopes and all our praise.

May our spirit never falter
Tho' the years indeed be long,
May it ever voice thy praises,
Dear old Bates, in cheer and song.

Boom, Bates, the Gallant Garnet,
Here's strength to you!
Take them and break them,
Smash them right straight through.
Where's the line of Bowdoin?
Back see it sway;
Three cheers for the Garnet,
It's the Garnets' day.
Rah—rah—rah!

We're down to hail the vict'ry,
Pledged, Bates, to you,
Up with the Garnet,
Down with Bowdoin's crew—
Not an inch of quarter,
—Now for the fight;
All the bells of Lewiston
Will clang tonight.
Rah—rah—rah!

Beat back the Bowdoin center,
That's the way to do.
Hang to the pigskin,
Cata-pault it through.
Drive 'em home for touchdowns,
Back see 'em roll,
Three cheers for the Garnet,
The Garnet and Goal.
Rah—rah—rah!

Bates, you're our pride and glory,
We're here for you.
Firm front we're marching
Bound to see you through.
Up the Androscoggin
Hear the spindles say:
"It's a hot old town will meet you
If Bates wins today."
Rah—rah—rah!

Cheer Bates and cheer the Garnet
One, two, three hurroo!
You've grit to down 'em,
Rise and smash them through.
Fight for Bates and glory,
Pluck cannot fail,
Three cheers for the Garnet
It must prevail.
